Vermont's top education official declared herself an "LGBTQ ally" during testimony in a case that could make the state the first in the nation to outlaw discrimination against transgender people. In remarks Wednesday before the House judiciary committee in Montpelier, Superintendent of Public Instruction Ellen Granas said she opposed the ban. "We should not create a situation where transgender students or employees have to face discrimination," she said. "That is wrong, and we will fight against it in the courts." The introduction of the bill last week came on the heels of pressure by Gov. Phil Scott and House Speaker Mitzi Johnson to ban the practice in employment, housing, and public accommodations, including schools and day cares. The Senate soon will take up the issue. "When we talk about discrimination, we are talking about whether a person who is a woman, who is a man, who is transgender, has the ability to be treated fairly in the workplace," Valentino-DeVries said last week. If the bill passes in both chambers of the legislature, it would go to Scott for his signature. The Republican governor has not said how he will act, but has not come out against it. "Transgender people are children in many ways," Johnson said last week. "They are children who require sensitivity and care. They are children who deserve the opportunity to be treated with respect and dignity." "These children need to be treated as equals," she added. "They need to be treated with sensitivity and understanding. They don't need to be discriminated against." The law could make Vermont the first state to outlaw discrimination against transgender people. Currently, there is no legal definition of what sex is. State law was amended in 2011 to reflect the fact that transgender people are people of the sex they identify with. The issue has been before the Human Rights Commission on two
